RESTORATION REPORT

The drought continues to make wetland and riparian restoration a challenging proposition at Rio Bosque Wetlands Park. The Park last received water January 12. Groundwater levels are again dropping steadily. At this writing, 5 new irrigation wells are being installed next to the Park. This winter, we did some limited plantings of Rio Grande cottonwood and coyote willow poles, but with the steadily dropping water table, their fate is uncertain. The water trailer the Friends of the Rio Bosque built last year is already in regular service as we work to keep these trees and others alive.

One change you might not notice when you visit Rio Bosque is the slow, steady disappearance of saltcedar as we remove it throughout the Park. Some former stands now host just a few scattered saltcedar, some are recently saltcedar free. See if you can find these areas on your next visit. ✂

FACILITIES UPDATE

By the time you read this newsletter, construction of the Park's visitor-contact station/education shelter should be underway. Also, the curbing and 2nd footbridge are now complete on the unbuilt portion of the Bosque Trail. The next steps are to install the trail sub-base and surface. ✂

WILDLIFE NOTES

Burrowing Owl numbers have declined at Rio Bosque in recent years, and one reason is loss of viable burrows. At least 6 formerly active burrows have collapsed or filled with sediment in the past 4 years and are no longer in use. On February 21, to help offset this trend, Park volunteers installed 4 artificial burrows, a project made possible by support from Chihuahuan Desert Wildlife Rescue and the El Paso/Trans-Pecos Audubon Society. Just 2 weeks later, the first burrow was in use, and at this writing owls have been observed at 3 of the 4 sites.

The long-term faunal monitoring program is gathering steam. In February, the
