

Jesse Musah is a PhD student in Interdisciplinary Health Sciences and a Graduate Research Assistant with the Health Policy Lab. His research focuses on health disparities, substance use, mental health, and HIV/STI-related risks, with an emphasis on how health policy affects underserved populations. He is committed to producing evidence that informs equitable public health policy and improves health outcomes in border communities. Prior to entering academic research, he worked as a Monitoring and Evaluation Officer on internationally funded programs supported by the Global Fund for malaria and Global Affairs Canada, contributing to work across several Global South communities.
